

Faith and Power

Soteriological vs Magic Religion (Russell)

- ▶ Soteriological religion promises personal salvation, typically in the afterlife.
- ▶ Magic religion focuses on the here and now and seeks to offer solutions to problems of the present world, such as disease and infertility.
- ▶ Soteriological religion is world-rejecting; magic religion is world-accepting.
- ▶ Soteriological religion presents the afterlife as essentially other; magic religion envisions it as essentially a continuation of the present life.

Power Factors in Soteriological Adoption Rates

- ▶ Heterogeneous (i.e. urban), anomic societies
- ▶ Repressed social groups
- ▶ Political instability

Motivations for adoption by political leaders:

- ▶ Increase social cohesion, political stability (“imagined community”)
- ▶ Extend influence through the power of the Church
- ▶ Raise threshold for social unrest

Conversion for extrareligious reasons tends to result in syncretism.

Northern Europe

Factors resisting conversion

- ▶ Rural
 - High degree of social cohesion
 - Local, community-based religious culture
- ▶ Society structured around kinship
 - High degree of social cohesion

Factors favouring conversion

- ▶ Desire among kings for consolidation of power
 - A Christian royalty, particularly one on good terms with the Church, discourages revolt among a Christian population
 - The Church could help organize the people into a power structure

Iceland

- ▶ No king!
- ▶ Kings of Norway interested in Christianizing Iceland
 - ▶ Christian mission
 - ▶ Political gain
- ▶ Goðar may also have had political reasons to adopt or resist Christianity

King Óláfr Tryggvason of Norway (reign 995–1000) saw the potential for political consolidation through missionary activity.

Substitution

During the five years in which he [i.e. Óláfr Tryggvason] bore the title of king in Norway, he converted five countries to Christianity: Norway, Iceland, Shetland, Orkney, and fifthly the Faroe Islands. He first erected churches by his own residences, and he did away with sacrifice and sacrificial toasts, substituting the festive toasts of Christmas and Easter, St John's Mass brew and the autumn ale at Michaelmas as a favour to the people (Ágrip ch. 19).

Iceland officially became Christian in 999 or 1000 and subject to the Norwegian Crown in 1262.
